I have so many wonderful memories of Carol. We met in high school while cheering together, and we also shared a lot of laughs through the youth group at Chandler First Baptist. She had such a fun, vibrant personality, and I only remember her smiling—we were always joking around. I only wish we had stayed in touch over the years. I'm keeping her friends and family in my prayers—she will be deeply missed.

“ We had so many that's it's hard to put into words. Maybe driving with them to their wedding. But hey I was there and happy about it. I think of her often and I don't think that'll ever change. See you at supper time friend.

“ Over the past few days, I’ve been pondering how to describe Carol, and I think I finally found it: She lived and she loved.

Carol lived. She was full in. She didn’t travel the world; in fact, she lived in small towns most of her life. She didn’t climb the corporate ladder or amass great wealth; the jobs she held involved serving others. But she brought her full self to the work, and that included doing her job well and focusing on others. And bringing laughter.

My children didn’t get to spend much time with Carol (due to geography), but I think they would all say she knew how to tell a story. And by “tell a story” they’d mean that she would tell on herself, and laugh at herself, even as we laughed with her. She was a lot like my mom in that.

And she could win you with her smile. It was a full-face smile, eyes and all, directed right at you.

Carol loved. She loved her husband, her children, and her grandchildren with a fierce, others-focused love. I remember late last fall as she was staying with her son in Amarillo while she received the treatment that was weakening her body and mind, she planned ways to be able to enjoy the holidays with her two grandsons. She knew she couldn’t be as active as previous years, but wanted to have special time and memories with them, nonetheless.

Our connection waxed and waned over the years, not due to any conflict but simply physical distance and the busy-ness of life. But the love was always there and we could pick right back up where we left off.

I wish I could've seen her, hugged her, laughed with her once more before she was gone. But I know that our times are in the Lord's hands. And I hope to see her in His heaven one day.

Love your loved ones. Seek the Lord while He may be found. Live your life before the face of God. Our times are in His hands
